Even the most perfect wisdom and goodness is dependent upon and impelled by the so-called lower faculties of animal feeling, emotion, desire, and the influences of environment and intellect, and not upon any higher human capacities, because we do not possess any; or, if we do, their existence remains to be proved. Infinite wisdom and unlimited truth are largely synonymous with each other and are consistent with the idea of omnipotent, omnipresent, infinite, and eternal causation; and the wisdom typified by the arrangement and working of the universe is the most comprehensive example of goodness. The most valuable effect of wisdom is goodness; goodness or virtue consists in doing the greatest good to all men, one s self included. The most independent and fearless man is he who has sufficiency of virtue, wisdom, knowledge, and money. In consequence of our extremely finite capacities, whilst we may have greed for knowledge and especially for money, for more than we can perfectly use, we cannot possess too much wisdom or goodness; the two differ in this respect from all other possessions; and herein lies infinite scope for virtuous ambition, and the attainment of a true heaven upon earth. As the scope for goodness is smaller the less intelligent the creed, ordinary religion and dogma does not usually produce the purest goodness. If the chief statements respecting the relations of science to conduct, so often reiterated in this book, are true, they necessarily lead...
