Learner biographies and learning cultures constitutes an important contribution to the under-researched field of vocational education and the school-to-work transition. Drawing on Butler s concept of discursive agency and Alheit s biographical approach, the book offers a new conceptual and methodological framework for exploring young people s construction of identity over time as well as in the specific learning sites of apprenticeship - the workplace and the college. The particular approach, concerned with young people s situated subjectivities, sets it apart from existing research, much of which focuses on social reproduction and portrays young people in vocational education as non-academic with enduring identities.
